RG8's net portfolio return was +2.8% in May, with gains again driven by companies in Korea and Taiwan exposed to the artificial intelligence (AI) infrastructure buildout.[2]

Continued AI capex by US mega cap technology firms remains the key earnings driver for the AI infrastructure buildout. We believe the best opportunities remain in areas where demand is strong, supply is tight and companies have clear pricing power. This remains evident across memory, leading edge chips, advanced packaging and power infrastructure and is continuing to broaden across the wider AI supply chain.

RG8 remains long companies including SK Hynix, Samsung Electronics, TSMC and Hyosung Heavy Industries, which are directly exposed to these themes. While we have taken profits in selected AI-related positions, we remain constructive and continue to hold reasonable exposure. At the same time, we are highly focused on where we are in the cycle, how much upside is already reflected in share prices and how best to position the portfolio. A key focus remains capex spending by US mega cap technology firms, given its importance in driving profits across the supply chain.

Defence remains another longstanding RG8 theme. Some defence stocks have underperformed recently after strong multi-year rallies, likely reflecting valuations moving ahead of fundamentals, fewer fresh geopolitical catalysts and investors waiting for earnings and backlog conversion. However, the structural outlook remains positive, with defence spending likely to keep rising globally as governments respond to geopolitical tension, alliance commitments, equipment replacement needs and the broader rebuild of military capacity.

Detractors in May included several short positions, defence-related longs, Singapore telecom Tuas Ltd and Japanese general contractors such as Kajima Corp and Taisei Corp.

Buy-back: In May, approximately 0.5m RG8 shares were bought at an average price of $2.86.
